LONDON, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1885.

the eleventh hour, in the electoral conflict has not allayed the anxieties of those Liberals, whom MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S aggressive policy has terrified and who have taken courage to assert their independence since the issue of the protest of the Whig peers against the agitation for disestablishment. The din of platform speeches is unabated, but there is a manifest decline of interest in the conto make up must have made them up long ago, and have formed resolutions, one way or other, which MR. GLADSTONE himself cannot modify. Lord HARTINGTON, SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, SIR CHARLES! dressed so much to the public opinion of the country as to local gatherings of voters, and their arguments, it must be admitted, were brought down to a corresponding level. efforts of the Conservative spokesmen, of whom Mr. W. H. Smith and Mr. Plunker were the most conspicuous, were scarcely more successful in giving fresh interest to wornout topics. Yet the questions before country have lost none of their urgency or weight. MR. GLADSTONE'S ingenious attempt to take his stand on an opportunist platform in Scotland will not in the least degree affect the position of men like LORD SELBORNE, who, in a letter printed in another column, has frankly declared that if he were competent to vote or to take a part in elections --- which as a peer, he is not-he would " certainly consider "the maintenance of the Established Church as of " much greater importance than the predominance of his own or the defeat of any other political earliest proceedings have justified the gloomy "party." It is difficult for us to realize the mental and moral conditions of a country in which such things can be, even though we are separated from it by so short a distance: or to find words in which these conditions can be adequately described without offence. It is hardly too much to say that they must constitute causing other countries to stand upon their defence, and to adopt the well-understood methods by which the spreading of cholera, as of almost any other epidemic, may be kept in check. It is to be hoped that LIEUTENANT VARONA, whose others to emulate his example. Such energy as his is often contagious, and individual effort, in time of public danger, may often serve to avert great calamities. But it is, after all, to the schoolmaster that we must mainly look for safety against disease, for intelligence enough to understand its causes and how to remove them, and for the knowledge that processions of image bearers, although they may help to disseminate contagion, can do nothing to arrest its progress. The Spanish pulpits appear to have been made the means of diffusing doctrines more worthy of an Indian' medicine man than of an ecclesiastic in the nineteenth century; and, even in Spain, there must be some limit to the degree in which the Church can afford, consistently with her influence and with her office, to stand forward as at least the as Lord Randolph Churchill has not yet learnt that every organ of Republican opinion, except a city of the late Dr. Snow caught at the possibility prevail. tacit opponent of doctrines which must in time to unimpeachable consistency in politics.
