The following resolutions all have to do with the South African coin, the Krugerrand. Doyle Dane Bernbach handles advertising for the Krugerrand in the U.S. The firm is asked to report to shareholders on its advertising contract, assessing how Krugerrand sales and ads positively or negatively affect the black population in South Africa and also to report on black gold miners' wages and working conditions in relation to the firm's Krugerrand business. First Union Bancorporation is asked to establish as policy that the corporation shall not promote, sell or distribute Krugerrands through its banks or affiliates until apartheid ends. Republic New York and First Chicago banks are asked to report to shareholders on the number of Krugerrands sold in 1980 and 1981, and to describe in the report the business relationship between the bank and the South African Chamber of Mines and the decision-making processes leading to the banks' participation in Krugerrand sales.

Xerox is asked to establish as corporate policy that it will not make any further loans or expand operations or make further sales to the police and military in South Africa until the South African government rescinds the laws and regulations which constitute the apartheid system.

The following corporation is asked to establish as corporate policy that it will not make or renew any contracts or agreement to sell, lease or service computers, parts or software to or for the use of the government of South Africa or any of its agencies or instrumentalities.

The following resolutions all have to do with the Sullivan Six Principles. Ingersoll Rand and Squibb are asked to comply with the requirements of the Principles. Ingersoll Rand is asked to adopt the principles as corporate policy. Beech-Nut Life Savers, Ltd. is a wholly-owned subsidiary in South Africa of Squibb, which signed the Principles in 1977. Rev. Sullivan's evaluation of Beech-Nut's performance is that it "does not meet basic requirements." The resolution requests that the company take action to insure that Beech-Nut meets the minimum requirements of the Code, and asks for a report on progress. In 1979 Dresser informed Rev. Sullivan that the company would not submit progress reports or allow on-site monitoring in South Africa. The resolution requests the Directors report to shareholders on the company's operations in South Africa and on its labor practices and policies as they affect the black population in South Africa.
