These goods are produced by African workers forced to work for 25¢ an hour by the racist police state government of South Africa.

It is your right to see the manifest, to know exactly what you are unloading and where it is from.

African miners and dockers have taken the lead in resisting the oppression of their people. They have asked for and need international support.

THE PRESSURE IS ON SOUTH AFRICA

Ian Smith, leader of the settler regime of Rhodesia, has been forced to negotiate with leaders of the liberation movements. The courageous struggle of the African people, both armed and peaceful along with real international solidarity has brought this about.

Successful boycotts in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, Mobile and San Francisco have been an important part of this effort.

U.S. corporations, busy cutting wages here by inflation, are worried about the billion dollars they have invested in forced labor in South Africa. The U.S. military is training South African police in tactics of torture and repression, to be used in part against striking African workers.

Stopping these strategic exports will materially aid both the struggle of African workers for their fundamental rights and national liberation, and the struggle of American workers against racism, the key tool the corporations use to divide us at home.
