There is a freedom crisis in the Portuguese African colony of Angola. Since 1961 Angola has been fighting for her independence from Portugal. Angola's right to freedom is supported by the United Nations as well as the United States. Gulf Oil Corporation financially supports this Portuguese war through its annual payments of over $50,000,000 per year for oil rights in Angola.

There is an "energy crisis" in the United States. To oil companies the term "crisis" does not necessarily mean the drying up of the source. Rather, "crisis" should be defined as the possibility that major oil companies will lose many of their cheapest sources of supply and will in turn be forced to seek supplies from higher cost sources. There is no crisis on the amount of crude oil available in the world.

Do not be misled by the current million dollar promotional advertising. United States oil companies, such as Gulf, do not have the right or the need to extract oil anywhere in the world, regardless of the cost to the people of that particular country! In its race for oil Gulf is impeding the freedom of 5.2 million Angolans.
